PASSION DRIVEN MOTIVATION

1. Congratulations Lydia and Anthony

“Jeffrey, your Sportsmind training program takes mental training to a level that I didn't know existed. My expectations were to learn mental skills that would help me perform better. Not only have I achieved this, but I now know myself at a different level. I have analysed all the aspects that make up me: my thoughts, emotions, beliefs and values. I have learned to take control over them, empowering me to shape my own future. Many thanks!”

Lydia Lassila, 2009 World Cup Aerial Skiing Champion... And now 2010 Olympic Gold Medalist!

“Last week I finished third in the Indonesian Open. This is my best result as a professional to date and was even more pleasing due to the strength of players in the field. I want to thank you again for your contribution to my performance, last week has opened up doors for next year which is a fantastic feeling. Again, thanks for your help not only last week but for all of my future endeavours – I truly feel that you have given me an advantage. Your friend always in the mental game.”

Anthony Brown,
Touring Golf Professional

It was the highlight of my career as a performance coach when, after 2½ years of working with Lydia Lassila, she won the Winter Olympic Gold Medal for aerial skiing this year. Lydia is without doubt the most persistent, courageous, focused and admirable athlete I've ever had the pleasure of working with, and she fully deserved her victory. Her story of coming back after her fall and serious injury in the previous Winter Olympics reads like an inspiring movie script – but it is all true, and her unshakable self belief in her dream and dogged persistence and commitment to her demanding training regimen demonstrates just what it takes to be an Olympic Champion.

It is significant to note that others in the Australian Winter Olympic team (including Lydia), used the services of a 'sports psychologist'.... however only Lydia sought out Sportsmind and engaged my services to give her that extra mental edge. This clearly demonstrated to me how effective the Sportsmind performance coaching program is – and how far ahead of the simplistic and out-dated traditional 'sports psychology' approach Sportsmind is!

For any serious sportsperson or coach aspiring to elite performance, make sure you see Lydia tell the story of her success and outline the mental training approach and techniques we used to prepare her for her successful Olympic Gold Medal campaign.

This is a special two-day workshop in Melbourne on 20th & 21st October – see full details in the Sportsmind Diary.

It was also fantastic to see another of my long term clients, Anthony Brown, come third in the recent Indonesian Open golf

3. How are you motivating yourself?

by Jeffrey Hodges B.Sc., M.Sc.(Hons)

There are literally thousands of excellent sportspeople who have the potential to play successfully in the top professional ranks, yet they don't make it, simply because they lose their motivation.

They lose their edge, their drive, their hunger.

This can happen easily when a sports-person allows themselves to become too influenced by 'average' people, and 'average' standards. One of the primary differences between a top sports-person and an average person is how they motivate themselves... top athletes have learned the difference between passion driven motivation and motivation that comes from necessity or coercion.

PASSION DRIVEN VERSUS COERCIVE MOTIVATION

I learned this many years ago when I was presenting a motivational talk on Goal Achievement to a group of employees in a workplace. Normally, once I help a sportsperson identify a desired goal or dream, that's it, the motivation kicks in, and this is the way most elite athletes operate... they have a strongly desired goal and use this to motivate their training and efforts. However, when I was speaking to this group of employees, I quickly discovered that such a motivation style was totally unfamiliar to them!

Firstly, many had difficulty envisaging exactly what they wanted for themselves, (their goals were given to them by their boss / team leader) – and more importantly, they were used to using a style of motivation driven by either necessity or coercion. In other words they did things either because they 'had to' or were 'forced to' at the behest of external forces or people.

Typical examples of this are: the student who leaves doing their assignment or essay until the last minute (when they HAVE TO, or fail); the person who leaves the washing or dishes until there are no clean clothes or dishes left (so they do the job out of necessity); or the footy player who only attends training on time because their coach punishes late-comers with a fine.

This type of thinking is a death knell to excellence, and the beginning of the slippery descent to the mediocrity of the masses, and must be carefully guarded against by anyone aspiring to outstanding levels of sports performance.

This is even more challenging here in Australia, because of the idiotic cultural tendency to cut our 'tall poppies' down to the level of the 'average' person!

The problem is that many, if not most, people use this inferior form of motivation – delaying action until absolutely necessary or waiting for orders, or threats, from some 'authority' figure in order to do things! This is unfortunately a result of our risk-averse parenting and education systems which discourage independent action, thought and opinion from an early age.

TRANSFORMING YOUR MOTIVATION STYLE

Given this common proclivity of many people for a coercive motivation style, one of the solutions that has been proposed by some thinkers is to harness the individual's existing negative motivation strategy by having them clearly imagine and feel the consequences of NOT taking some specific action – what will it COST you if you DON'T do such and such?

Others suggest a combination of both positive and negative motivation styles – kind of like a cost benefit analysis, where you think of all the costs of not taking some action AND then all the benefits of taking the action. So you end up with a double dose of motivation – so the theory goes.

Certainly both ideas can assist in improving motivation, and particularly the second method is preferable to the first, however I am increasingly coming to the view that positive, desire driven motivation – by itself – is the most effective.

The challenge I have with thinking too much about 'costs' is that it is simply an unnecessary step, and hence a waste of thought that might be more usefully directed towards the positively desired outcome.

So the solution, I now believe, is not to emphasise the negative consequences of NOT taking action, but rather to TEACH people HOW to become inspired by passion and desire.

THE OUTCOME CHAIN

I believe the way to do this is through what is known as an 'outcome chain' – identifying the driving VALUE or more significant goal the individual is really seeking.

You see, none of us really wants what we say – on the surface – we want! We might say we want to win a gold medal, or to become a professional golfer, or to have a new car, or house, or more money. However, few people really WANT those things – they want WHAT THOSE THINGS WILL GIVE THEM! So someone wants more money because of the sense of security it gives them, or they want a gold medal for the sense of fame and celebrity it brings.

By identifying the deeper VALUE DRIVERS which lie beneath each and every goal or desire we have, you can unlock a more powerful positive form of motivation.

Try this – Answer this question: What do you want?

Say the first thing that comes to mind in relation to your sport.

Now ask this question repeatedly until you unearth the driving value behind the surface goal: "What will this give you that is even MORE important?"

Here's an example from my own life from a few years ago when I did this process for one of my own goals:

What do you want? Answer: Black belt in Aikido.

What will this give you that is even MORE important? Answer: Respect from Clients.

What will this give you that is even MORE important? Answer: More Clients.

What will this give you that is even MORE important? Answer: More money.

What will this give you that is even MORE important? Answer: Freedom. Independent Lifestyle – being my own boss.

Now the task is to write out the desired goal BACKWARDS starting with the value driver, and make it into a meaningful sentence: "I want the freedom of an independent lifestyle, being successfully self employed with my own business, earning a high income from having many clients who respect me because I have earned my black belt in Aikido."

Compare the above statement with the simplistic "I want to get a black belt", and you can see how identifying and then linking the surface goal / desire with the underlying emotion or value driving it makes it much more potent as a motivating force.

Try it yourself.
